Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a process and a device for organizing the steps of a sensing process, and more specifically to a process and a device for organizing the steps of a sensing process by which a signal processing can be carried out in parallel at a plurality of sensors. 2. Description of the Prior Art Conventionally, a driving method for sensing process is practiced by which a signal for driving a sensing process is transmitted from a sensor to a control section to apply a driving pulse to the sensing element of the sensor which is being tested and a voltage of the load-connected electrode between the sensor and the control section is measured by a voltmeter. The measured voltage is the sensing signal. In this method, it is important that a sensing signal be obtained with the same output as that of the sensing element and that the voltage waveform should be free from the influence of ground potential, noise and the like. However, in the conventional 1cdb36666d
